Boundary commission makeup shifts

Staff Report
Published May 9, 2007
The faces are changing at the state's Local Boundary Commission.
Chairman Darroll Hargraves announced last week that he will step down from the commission this summer. The news follows the April resignation of Tony Nakazawa, who until last month represented the state's Fourth Judicial District — which includes Fairbanks — for four years on the commission.
The Local Boundary Commission considers proposals to create, or alter the boundaries of, municipal governments.
Hargraves, a Wasilla resident, is leaving in order to "seek new business opportunities and political options that may be available to me in coming months."
Nakazawa left the commission April 30. A former director of the University of Alaska Fairbanks Cooperative Extension Service, he is in the process of moving to southcentral Alaska to take a post at the UAF Palmer Research and Extension Center.
Nakazawa said the commission and its staff have a difficult job. "We're fortunate to have those people, the ones that have served before and the ones that will come in the future."

no problem - and let me ask Meg if she feels we need more ammo in final days.

FYI I just told NewsMiner that I'd have to veto AGIA if it got "gutted" and the "shalls" were turned into "mays" before the legislation was adopted... because then AGIA would do us no good - it would not have parameters, it would lead to futility as the last negotiations led to, and it wouldn't be fair to AK nor to applicants... too much "discretion" (ie potentially undue influence) could play too big a factor in selection process if we don't have must-have requirements and rules to follow.

I'm being told "no".

Individually gasline team folks have/are meeting with leg leaders whom the bodies send our way (last night Stedmen and Chenault wanted to talk to me and Tib about "shalls" and "mays"), but no meetings with the sub-committee of 7 members that Harris mistakenly claimed we were meeting with - Harris even wrote a letter of correction after misspeaking.

> > - Most of the administration's changes in SB-104 were technical, but one includes a shortening of the performance deadline. Project sanctioning by a licensee lacking sufficient financing must be complete in five years from the time of an open season rather than five years from receiving a FERC certificate.

- The draft defines "sanction" as a firm commitment of at least $1 billion to the project.
- Language was included that a 300% penalty to the state for assisting a "competing" project is the maximum compensation a licensee would receive. In other words, a licensee, by accepting the treble damages, would be prevented from suing the State of Alaska for additional damages.

Informal AGIA working group

- Press reports that the informal AGIA committee, comprised of House and Senate members, have been disbanded are untrue. Legislators involved in the effort say discussions between the working group and the Administration continue.
- Representing the legislature on the working group discussing AGIA fixes with the administration are Sens. Charlie Huggins, Bert Stedman and Lyman Hoffman and Reps. Ralph Samuels, Mike Chenault, Mike Kelly and Reggie Joule.
- Focus of the discussions is changes aimed at increasing competition in the bidding process. Many legislators are concerned that prescriptive bidding requirements in the current drafts of the two bills could result in as few as two applications for the state license: MidAmerican and the Alaska Gasline Port Authority.
- Another concern has been the provision restricting the proposed state pipeline coordinator's services to streamline the permitting process to the state license holder at the possible expense of a competing project. Revenue Commissioner Pat Galvin told Senate Finance there's nothing in the bill that would prohibit the legislature from establishing another pipeline coordinator position to expedite competing projects.

Special session?

- A special session to review and potentially revise the Petroleum Profits Tax (PPT) is likely in early fall. Fifteen House Democrats sent a letter to Gov. Palin yesterday asking for the session in the wake of reports that some votes on the bill, as it was enacted last year, were influenced illegally. Palin replied she is favorable of the idea.
- The 2006 special sessions that produced the PPT were contentious and highly-charged. A 2007 special session reviewing the law is likely to be the same.
- Adoption of the PPT to replace the former gross profits-based calculation for production taxes yielded nearly $900 million in additional state revenues in FY 2007, and it was the largest tax increase in state history. It's unclear whether legislators will seek to refund the additional monies resulting from PPT, which they are now in the process of spending.
- The two AGIA bills could move out of their respective Finance committees as early as today, with floor action to follow. Unlike other recent high-profile legislation, the AGIA bills aren't expected to trigger a floor fight in either body.

Hello Governor,

First of all- thanks for adding so much fun to the fundraiser with the stories from Dennis Egan and the Gruenings. That was perfect!

Just to clarify—so I know we're on the same page.
The House will be alcohol-free almost... We will need champagne for some celebrations (could be locked in basement closet). In the kitchenette fridge (2nd. floor) there will only be a small bottle of wine (or 2) and a few beers.

With such a small amount it will be very easy to keep an eye on things. We will just make purchases on an as needed basis, so we won't have the huge inventory and the temptation.

If I don't hear back I'll assume that I got it right!

Enjoy Cordova!
